Cerebro's guide to the

X-MEN

■ BEGIN ENTRY

From: Charles Xavier
Re: The Cerebro Files

Information is power.

When I decided to form the X-Men to teach young mutants how to cope with their unusual abilities, my first problem was very basic: how to locate these potential students. Hence, I devised the cybernetic tracking system that we now call Cerebro. Although it functions best when linked to the mind of a telepath such as myself, Cerebro can detect and track the unusual bio-energies emitted by mutants with superhuman abilities.

Through Cerebro, the Xavier Institute has been able to discover and monitor superhuman mutants throughout the world, including both our allies and our adversaries. Using this information, my students and I have compiled extensive computer files on these mutants. We also maintain data files on non-mutants with whom the X-Men have been in contact. When mutants are hated and despised, when one can never predict who or what may attack us next, the Cerebro Files are among the X-Men's most valuable resources.
